Donald Trump returns to Florida in 2020. He obviously knows that.

The phase one Florida model has spent more time in the Sunshine State than any other state in the nation, even during the depths of the pandemic. The governor has worked hard to maintain an active, productive, and lively political presence in the state, which has been important to the Republican Party's success in the state.

While the president is still a powerful force in national politics, his influence in Florida has been diminished in recent years. The state has become more competitive, with Democrats making gains in key races, and the president has struggled to mobilize the party base.

Nevertheless, Donald Trump remains a force to be reckoned with in Florida. He continues to wield significant influence in the state and is likely to remain a key figure in the political landscape for many years to come.

"The state is still very much a "win or lose" environment for the Republican Party of Florida. The former president has a lot of influence in the state and will be a key figure in future elections.

The former president's supporters remain strong in Florida, and he continues to be a popular figure among many Republicans. His influence will likely be felt in future elections, and his legacy will be a significant part of the political landscape for years to come."
