Florida voters could deliver final verdict in Joe Biden vs. Bernie Sanders presidential primary race

Bernie Sanders, who has spent the past several weeks campaigning in Florida, is trying to keep his momentum going after a strong performance in the Iowa caucuses last month. Sanders, who is trailing behind Biden in national polls, is hoping to make a strong showing in the Florida primary on March 17th, which is the third-largest primary in the Swing States coalition.

Biden, on the other hand, is focusing on winning the majority of the delegate count and securing enough votes to clinch the nomination. Biden has a solid lead in national polls and is expected to win the bulk of the delegates in the Super Tuesday primary on March 3rd.

Sanders is counting on a strong showing in the Florida primary to boost his campaign and keep his hopes alive for a contested convention. Sanders has been critical of Biden’s approach to the campaign, saying that his more moderate stance is not enough to win over the progressive wing of the Democratic Party.

Biden, on the other hand, has been emphasizing his experience and his ability to unite the Democratic Party behind him. Biden has also been critical of Sanders’ approach, saying that his radical proposals are too far-left for the Democratic Party to support.

The Florida primary is one of the most important contests in the primary season, as it is the third-largest primary in the Swing States coalition and is expected to have a significant impact on the nomination race.

In summary, Sanders is counting on a strong showing in the Florida primary to keep his campaign alive, while Biden is focusing on winning the majority of the delegate count and securing enough votes to clinch the nomination. The Florida primary will be a key contest in determining the outcome of the Democratic presidential primary race.