Florida will hold its presidential primary on March 17. But the contest has been overshadowed by the state's early vote, which was held on Feb. 18. The results have been closely watched as a preview of what's to come.

The first round of early voting was held on Feb. 18. It was a success, with over 2 million people casting their ballots. The turnout was higher than in previous years, which is likely due to the fact that many people were unable to vote in the primary election due to the coronavirus outbreak.

The Florida Democratic Party has been working hard to ensure that the vote is as fair and free as possible. They have been setting up polling places throughout the state, and have been working with local officials to make sure that everyone has access to the vote.

The Florida Republican Party has also been working hard to ensure that the vote is as fair and free as possible. They have been setting up polling places throughout the state, and have been working with local officials to make sure that everyone has access to the vote.

The results of the early vote are likely to have a big impact on the outcome of the primary election. The Democratic Party is expected to do well, with Florida's Hispanic vote likely to play a key role in the final outcome.

The Florida Republican Party is also expected to do well, with Florida's Hispanic vote likely to play a key role in the final outcome.

Overall, the Florida primary election is likely to be a close one, with both parties working hard to ensure that their candidates get the victory.
