The Fed is saying interest rates are going higher and will stay there through 2023. As markets absorb those expectations, mortgage rates will move up.

— Greg McBride, CFA, Bankrate

Fears of a looming recession and aggressive Fed activities continue to push up and invert the yield curve. This all results in higher 10-year T-Note yields, and higher T-Note yields result in higher mortgage rates. The trend will remain the same next week. Thus, we can expect 30-year mortgage rates to increase once again.

Up, up and away with inflation leading the charge.

Higher. With the inflation rate in August higher than expected, the Fed is forced to continue the rate increases with another coming today (9/21/2022). Look for rates to continue to rise due to worsening economic conditions. As a consumer, watch for rates to continue to go up until inflation rates start to go down.

Up. The Fed is far from done.

Higher. In paying attention to the words of the FOMC, it would serve well to know that a main cause of inflation is the Fed itself. The M2 money supply is too high, but the Fed fears that reducing it will cause recession, and the Fed started increasing the overnight rate too late.
Vote: Up. The Fed is saying interest rates are going higher and will stay there through 2023. As markets absorb those expectations, mortgage rates will move up.

Higher. The Fed concluded their meeting this week with another 75 basis points increase to Fed Funds. Their expectations are for another minimum 150 basis points of increases, supposedly stopping in 2023 with a Fed Funds rate in the range of 4.60 percent. As inflation continues to run at 40-year highs, there should be no expectation that rates will be pulling back any time soon. We have never seen the type of inflation conditions currently in effect, so how we get out will be a chore for Chair Powell and the Federal Reserve.

Rates - lower. It's no big surprise inflation remains stubborn, and it will take a while for the series of Fed hikes to curb it. And there are more hikes coming. Bonds have been trending lower (higher rates) and are at the bottom of a channel, poised for a rally. Should the bond market rally, any rate improvement will be small. With that in mind, I would still play defense and lock your rate.

As expected, the Federal Reserve raised its overnight lending rate by .75 percent. Additionally, their statement said, “Recent indicators point to modest growth in spending and production. Job gains have been robust in recent months.” The Fed is raising rates to slow down spending production and employment gains. This is a rather hawkish statement by the Fed. However, I do believe bond markets were expecting this type of hawkish statement and have priced it in. So hopefully we will get a break from the seemingly constant increase in mortgage rates. Mortgage rates flat in the coming week.
