Inflation is still prevalent in wages and food prices. Can you say “7 percent” by the end of the third quarter?

The economy is heating back up and that has to concern the Fed.

[The] fed funds rate increased by 25 basis points; other interest rates including mortgage rates will follow.

As expected the Federal Reserve raised the federal funds rate 0.25 percentage points at the end of the FOMC’s July meeting. During his press conference Fed Chairman Jay Powell reiterated the Fed’s commitment to get inflation down to its target of 2 percent. He also mentioned that the Fed will be data-dependent moving forward and that the Fed could raise rates at the next meeting but they could also pause. After selling off into this meeting, I think bonds will rally a bit after this less hawkish stance from the Fed. Lower mortgage rates in the coming week.

Lower.

I expect rates to be lower next week. Data pertaining to inflation across the economy has generally been more positive than expected in recent weeks, but after the Fed delivered a hawkish pause in their rate hiking program last month, the market seems to be a little cautious. I expect that Chair Powell will be quick to remind us that the Fed’s job isn’t done, but he will nonetheless signal a bit more optimism in light of recent data and the market will respond accordingly.

Even inflation couldn’t keep up with higher cost of living. Mortgage rates are headed down.

A Fed rate hike was a foregone conclusion but the mystery surrounds what will happen with inflation. If we see meaningful improvement in core inflation, that’ll help tame long-term rates too.

The Federal Reserve increased [the fed funds rate] to the highest level since 2001, indicating that inflation still remains an issue and they are determined to drive inflation towards its target range of 2 percent. The decision was made even as inflation continues to come down. While this will impact many interest rates, taking them higher, look for mortgage rates to catch a break and move slightly lower.

25% say unchanged—

Rates move when the unexpected happens. A 25-basis point hike was expected and the 30-year fixed will stay at the annoyingly high 7 percent.
Markets have already baked in the Fed’s decision on rates. Thus, there should be little to no movement in the yield of 10-year Treasurys, which should result in little to no movement in mortgage rates. Next week, long-term mortgage rates will be unchanged.

The Fed’s 25-basis point rate hike was already baked into the interest rate structure, so I do not expect that it will have any impact on rates. Given what’s going on with the economy, T-bill rates and other factors, I expect rates to be flat in the short term.
