The bond market is nervous and the trend in long-term yields is higher. This is particularly relevant to mortgage rates as the spread over Treasurys is bloated and increasing further.

Fed fund rate increase means the Fed still does not have inflation under control. That signals rates will continue to increase.

Congress is fighting over debt limits again. Homebuyers get the fallout.

The yield on 10-Year Treasurys nudged above 4.00 percent again. Because mortgage rates are highly correlated with the yield on 10-Year Treasurys, we should see mortgage rates soon follow. Next week, long-term mortgage rates should increase.

Up. An improving economy and decelerating inflation are not necessarily consistent.
Stronger economic numbers coupled with a downgrade in U.S. debt by Fitch are weighing on the interest rate complex. Add to that employment numbers that have been better than expected means things may be looking worse before we see some improvement.

Uncertainty continues to move mortgage rates higher.

I expect rates to be lower in the week to come, following this week’s jobs report. A continuation in last month’s report showing weaker than expected payroll data would firm up pricing in the [mortgage-backed securities] market.

Les Parker

Mortgage rates go down. Here's a parody based on the Gorillaz classic "Up On Melancholy Hill": "Up on Melancholy Hill, There's a data tree. Are they here for bears? Just looking out on the curve or another dream." The curve believes that the Fed reached its terminal rate. Interpreted data drive rates. Is this the week data support lower rates? Yes.

Rates have moved up to a high for the year with the 30-year at 7.125 percent. Fitch downgraded U.S. Treasury debt. This could have serious consequences.

Unchanged. Following last week’s expected rate hike, I look for all players to seek calm while they ferret out what’s going to happen in the economy. The probability of a soft landing is looking a bit more uncertain, and the use of more Fed tools is not out of the question. For the next week, I think we see rates stay pretty close to their current levels, relatively speaking.
